

Introduction of Ann Cannon

Ann Cannon grew up in Irvington, a small Kentucky town in Breckinridge county. She went to Meade County High School. Then went to Bellarmine University and received a bachelor's degree in computer science in 1984, then 20 years later received a master's degree in teaching also from Bellarmine. In between those 20 years, she worked as a computer programmer at Bellarmine University. She then pursued a career as an elementary school teacher working in Jefferson, Carroll, and Oldham County Public Schools teaching 1st through 5th grades. She retired from teaching and is now working part-time at the Oldham County History Center as the Office Program Director.

She and her husband have resided in Oldham County for 26 years. She has a daughter, son-in-law, and four grandchildren, who are the apple of her eye.

Ann's father shared his love of history with her as a child by visiting many historical sites during vacations and explaining the significance of each one. When historical events were happening on television, he would tell Ann and her brother, "Kids watch this closely, this is History in the Making!" This is how her love of learning of history began.
